RATIFICATION.

Republicans have good reason to be pleased with the County ticket. They are going to manifest it publicly this evening at the Court House. There will be good speeches, singing and a good time generally. A large attendance is desired. This meeting will start the pitch for the campaign, and it ought to be a high one. Show your approval of common sense politics, and your endorsement of candidates of experience and ability by your presence at the meeting this evening.

FEDERAL ELECTION LAW.

In some respects the fate of the Federal Election law and the bill which has been presented to the House for its repeal is the most important that has been before the people for many years. The question is one which equally concerns every part of the country and which reaches the very foundations of our system of government. During the War of Secession, and the period of reconstruction, the decisions of legislation and of the Supreme Court decisions was in favor of strengthening the authority of the national government. It was felt, naturally enough, that the war was made possible by the sacrifices of the Federal union, and that in no other way could the results of the war be made permanent than by their embodiment in constitutional amendments and national statutes. These have been accepted by both North and South, and are equally binding upon all sections of the country.

It has been a favorite argument among those Republicans who have been called wavers of the "Bloody shirt," that the acquiescence of the South in these laws was no more than an enforced compliance with their letter, and that the spirit of State rights was in no wise dead and needed only a suitable opportunity to grow into activity, to the danger of the country of the Democratic party immediately after it came into power in significant and as far as to show that the Republican assertions were truthful.

It should not be forgotten, however, that the Federal elections law, as it stands on the statute books, was not primarily a reconstruction measure. Its purpose was not to secure justice in Southern elections, but to prevent frauds in large cities, chiefly of the North. But the arguments now being urged in the House to secure its repeal have a distinctly anti-negro flavor. Within the past few days, there have been repeated by Southern Congressmen and their Northern allies very many of the States-rights heresies, which were once used in support of the doctrine that the Nation had no power to interfere with the "Divine right" of human slavery. The old idea that an American is a citizen of the United States because he is a citizen of a State, has been revived. A Southern Senator, in speaking of his official capacity has repeated the word "ambassadorial," and over the signature has been set forth that a popular election indorsing a platform of a score of varied propositions should be sufficient to override the calm and formal decision of the Supreme Court.

But these Democratic arguments in favor of a repeal of the only law now existing designed to secure honest elections have another significance. The purpose of this repeal, plainly avowed in the Houses and in Senate, the permanence of the Democratic control in the national government. Without the Federal Election law, the performance of the Tammany machine, ensures the addition of New York to the Solid South. Without the Federal Election law the same elements in Chicago which raised Carter Harrison to the mayoralty, may imitate the Tammany methods of fraud and violence, and add Illinois to the hopelessly Democratic column. Without this law, in any large city where a few unscrupulous and shrewd politicians can secure Election control, they can perpetuate their power and control their will with at regard to the wishes or the numbers of the more decent citizens of the city and of the State.

The Democratic party before the war, entirely under the management of slavery, was a compact organization that was for the retention of the Federal administration in Democratic hands. The party of to-day is the latter only in its purpose and methods. Democrats will hesitate at nothing. The South has been solidified against the North, and the North must be conquered by fraud. The Democratic party now is less that just falls in with the South, and is dependent upon it for its existence. It is the South's path to that delightful prospect of perpetual control, by Congressmen and Cabinet Messrs, a twenty-year period of the Democrats of the Legislative, Executive and Judicial departments of the Federal government.

Since May last, the Republican minority in this country is of the opinion that the Democratic party as the result of the present Congress and Board will remain a party. We are really believe this to be the case. Democratic experience with a majority has not been so very fortunate, and it is not for to a monarchy in many respects. History affords few precedents for a backward change of this kind, and Spain is the only one where the reactionaries have prevailed.

The latest device in vogue in the Democratic way of raising the government is a farce with the postoffice revenues for the year. Just why people should write fifty letters an less the Democracy, that, when the Republicans were in charge it is said to say, that the deficit is due to be a failing of Democratic administration.

Omaha wants to be a State. Whether it gains its desire depends on the assurance it can give of its devotion to the Democracy. If the case were to be decided in its favor, it would probably be the first act of a new Congress.

CAUSES OF ELECTRIC LIGHT CHANGES.

The General Electric company of Berlin proposes to adopt the new clock of Herr Von Hefner-Alteneck, which may be placed in circuit like an ordinary incandescent lamp and is claimed to solve the problem of providing an inexpensive yet effective system of electric control of clocks. The current keeps the clock wound at an hourly cost not exceeding that of one incandescent lamp burning for an hour, perhaps eight or ten cents. Should the circuit be broken, the clock will run without the current about twelve hours. The regulation is performed by hand from the dynamo room or automatically from an observatory, subject to a momentary lowering of the circuit potential by six to ten volts, which is the effect being to set all the clocks in the circuit at work. The lamps are not appreciably affected.

RAPID TRANSIT FOR BERLIN. The Metropolitan Railway of London has been tested for two years of opera and its success has led to the designing by its engineers, Mr. J. H. Greathead, of a longer railway of the same kind for Berlin. This line is to connect in two years's time to have the form of a double circle, the outward and the return tubes being laid side by side, and the whole of the most thickly settled portion of the city town will be traversed. There will be eleven stations. It is expected that from twelve to fifteen trains will be kept running during eight hours per day, giving a train each way every two and one half minutes. A consumption of thirty tons of coal daily is to give energy of 2,000 horse power. Of this, 500 horse power will be used for twenty two lifts, electric elevators, 100 horse power for electric lighting, and 1,400 horse power for the electric cars.

OVER A ROYAL KNEE.

HOW THE PRINCE OF WALES WAS CHASTISED BY HIS MOTHER.

Her Majesty Is Benevolent, but She Has a Violent Temper—Personal Observations of a Member of the Royal Household. HER MAJESTY'S HOME LIFE.

(Special Correspondence.)

LONDON, Sept. 24.—Shortly after my arrival in London I was fortunate in making the acquaintance of an old lady through whom I have obtained considerable insight into the private character of the personal court of the British throne, and from whom I have learned much of the home life of the royal family.

I have enjoyed the friendship of this intelligent and interesting old lady, who has for 40 years Primed one of the queen's household, with many tales illustrative of the home relations of her royal mistress. These I have published would prove interesting and instructive, especially the concluding portion of the queen's early married life when the training of her young family from her, in full public statistics of national sympathy which so much for admiration taught well the mothers of young mothers among her subjects.

I suspect that Queen Victoria's universal popularity among the masses is due more to the of the community members of her own sex should, to verbal expressions of her sympathy, but by personal and to the well circulated but unofficial testimony of the many thankful recipients of her private bounty than to any public display or published proofs of it.

The queen is a woman of a very high temper, and her loyal subjects are fully aware of the fact. Her majesty's outbursts of temper are not to be, and from, every by written warrant. Queen Victoria is not close fisted or miserly. On the contrary, she is extremely generous, and is fully conscious of charity and giving, and her reward to the needy and deserving. But her charity is with a reservation. She does nothing for display.

HER MAJESTY AT 70 YEARS.

No one ever hears of very large donations from the queen, for she is not lavish in that way. Her expenditure as Princess Victoria of Kent was such as to render practical economy necessary, and although quite young when called to the throne, she learned by her father's financial troubles, and by their impression and developed that prudence which has guided her in her exchequer in its during the many years of her long reign.

Queen Victoria's charity begins at home. Her first care is for the welfare of those around her. Her solicitude for the comfort of those under her household is proverbial. With a tact of her majesty makes herself familiar with the circumstances and needs of every member of her household, even the humblest domestic is not overlooked—and this without the least suspicion of an obtrusive supervision.

Her majesty is one of the generous acts within the royal household is well known to the public. Only once in awhile, when a thoughtful or special character, does the court gossiper get a chance to chronicle an instance, when her majesty, having ascertained that a number of the children of the domestic and other servants at Buckingham palace were neglected in the matter of education, ordered the purchase of premises in Palace street, Pimlico, and had them fitted up as a school for the children.

When it is considered that this school, which opened with 60 scholars, was supplied with teachers of tried ability, and that the entire expense was defrayed by the queen, who for nearly 40 years has continued to support it out of her private purse, it will be acknowledged that as one of the incidentals this donation goes a long way toward refuting the charge of parsimony against England's illustrious monarch.

I find, however, from the same source which I have hitherto quoted, that no exaggeration is possible in any report relative to her majesty's abnormally violent temper. It is a fact that England's queen is subject to outbursts of passion that are simply astounding in their violence and often startling in their results. While the exposure let it is often necessary to resort to a form of restraining force that is not compatible with our notions of a proper estimate of royalty.

Fortunately the occasions of temper are generally indulged in as an indoor amusement, and the public are spared the spectacle of their sovereign in a state of frenzy, except in the rare instances when she is seized with one of her tempers. I have heard of only one instance where a display of this character was here before a public audience, and of her majesty. The occasion was a royal review. The queen, Prince Albert, and some of the royal children, with their usual attendants, were soon boarded the queen's yacht, ready to steam out to review the ships. The pier was crowded with people in holiday attire, and every eye was on the royal yacht as she lay boat waiting for the signal to start.

The attention of the queen was called to the fact that the people expected to see her. Although not to linger in the best of ways, she nevertheless stepped out of the pavilion and took a seat on the deck. The Prince of Wales, who was then a youth of between 16 and 17 years, followed his mother, and for a few minutes stood by her side. After the round of cheering which her appearance called forth had subsided, and she had bowed in acknowledgment, she looked around for the little prince, who had slipped away.

Observing him engaged in some childish amusement at a short distance from where she sat, she called him to come to her. He did not immediately heed her, and she called again:

"Bertie, come here."

On his failure to respond to this second command the queen, who could not brook the least sign of disobedience in her children, jumped up in a towering rage and walked with rapid step to where the young prince was. Seizing him, she drew him across her knee as she sank into a handy steamer chair and proceeded to spank him with a vim that filled the spectators with astonishment and the royal courtiers with mortification.

A deed of the occasion, for the unexpected novelty of beholding a vigorous flagellation of their future king by the royal hands of his illustrious mother rendered full present mute. It was not until her majesty's wrath was well high spent that the ludicrousness of the position suggested itself to some one on the spot, and an infectious laugh that immediately resolved into a roar of merriment recalled the exhausted queen to her senses and drove her to seek the seclusion which her cabin granted. On this occasion no one seemed to suspect that her gracious majesty was making use of the Prince of Wales to work off a fit of chronic passion. Indeed, the affair was accepted as a royal example of parental discipline, and is doubtless found imitators, to the sorrow and regret of many a young English lad.

GEORGE W. GRANT.

HER REWARD.

Different Methods Pursued by Two Summer Girls.

It was the close of the season at the seaside resort. In a few days the last departing guest would vanish, the huge piles of trunks would look away, and the hotel would be closed. Down the beach a towering rock near the beach was radiant with the glory of their season. Both were beautiful, both had been the queens of all society, but the great hotel indeed, the lovers were equally devoted, and strange to say, both were warm friends.

"You remember Charlie Warrington, who came in July?" said Clara. "The first night I met him he held my hand, and the second night he actually had the audacity to put his arm around my waist."

"Yes," replied Maud, "he tried to do the same thing to me."

"He tried to do that to little Harry Smart," continued Clara. "Still a dancer he was! But, really, I was afraid of the boy! I was so persistent. Do you know, in three days time the sap kissed me! I remember that night very well. We were on the piazza at the time, and it was dark almost before I knew it."

"Yes," said Maud, "he tried to do the same thing to me."

"Then there was young Calloway," went on Clara, absorbed in her own reflections. "He is dear. He was such an adorable fellow. I do you know, dear, the first night I met him I really thought he was beautiful. But I didn't think so the next night, when we sat in the hammock just off from the dancing pavilion. I felt his arm steal around my waist, and then his lips pressed to my cheek, really, dear, I was shocked."

"Yes," dreamily responded Maud, "he tried to do the same thing to me."

"But wasn't Percy Willowcamp the greatest boy for cut-and-dry?" asked Clara. "Do you know, I had my most desperate flirtation with him. I didn't think you noticed it, for you were busy elsewhere, but it was great sport. He was so indifferent at first, and I thought I would have to bring him to terms. But he finally asked me to walk. Then to dance, and I danced and danced with another fellow. He was furious, but it was just what I wanted. The next night we took a walk on the sands, that passionate thing of Bronson's, you know—something about the moonlight kiss first."

"Yes, I remember," said Maud.

"And he was so handsome, and so there in the moonlight, that I was sure it was wrong to me, but I let him kiss me on the lips once, twice."

"Yes, dear," interrupted Maud, "it was very wrong of him, and you should have told him. He tried to do the same thing to me."

"And do you mean to say," burst out Clara, "that you wouldn't let him do any of the rest?"

"Yes, dear," gently responded Maud, drawing the sister nearer to her, "I should have. I should have told him I was engaged, that if one is kind there is great reward in store. Tell me, dear, have you gained anything beyond a pleasant time for this summer?"

"Why, no," wonderingly queried Clara. "What do you mean? I never heard you talk that way before. You make me tired. I would like to know what you drift at."

"Then, dear, I will tell you," replied Maud, "and you will be sorry for me. I don't get tired. I don't mind, but rather that we should return once to Newport and enjoy more of the sea breeze."

And she held up her own little hand to view.

And on the third finger were four sparkling engagement rings.—Truth.

A Place For Palms.

Two boxes, one large and narrow, the other a little less in depth, will make very a pretty piece of sitting-room furniture if the planing, sawing and painting can be done at home. It will cost next to nothing. But with a carpenter in the employ it will not be dear. After the boxes are smoothed off and the shelves are put in they are joined together, then painted. A dark oak or cherry stain is good, or black paint. White also will be pleasing if a light piece of furniture is desired. Each box is furnished with a curtain hung on a rod.

One of the sets of shelves thus obtained will make a good place for books. The other, with curtains cord looped drawn, will serve for a medicine chest. Or two large pots and magazines. The two large surfaces on top will hold pots or ferns, this being the chief use of the whole. If casters are put on, the pots
